In the meeting with PhD and MA students, I would like to speak about my current research on migrant entrepreneurs and the nexus of migration and development in Kosovo. I would be happy to discuss about methods with PhD and MA students.

Few places in Europe are shaped so consistently by migration like the former Yugoslavia. Zooming in on Kosovo, my project explores socio-economic effects of emigration and return migration on local communities within their broader socio-political context. Focusing on entrepreneurial activities, I apply an intersectional approach, relating migrant agency to social status, state policies, family and kinship, gender, and value orientations. My approach is multidisciplinary, non-normative, context-sensitive, and actor-centered: which economic strategies do (did) migrants, and their families, develop by exploiting the multi-faceted resources gained by migration? How do they respond to government initiatives to influence their (investment) behaviour, how do they relate to expert discourses? By that, I explain persistent homeland oriented migrant engagement in Kosovo and its impact on the home society. I furthermore de-construct visions of "development" underpinning state efforts to channel migrant investment by exploring their ideological framings and trace bottom-up the effects of entrepreneurial activities of (return) migrants. In my lecture, I would focus on methodologies and I would like to invite students to reflect and discuss about methodologic approaches.
